apartment which he had neither the duty nor privilege of changing. The landlord was called. He claimed that he had purchased the building with the assurance that all laws had been complied with. He had not had his attention called to the fire risk of the stove. The builder of the house was then called. He admitted that he was responsible for setting the stove and neglecting to provide a metal hearth of the required kind between the stove and the floor. The penalty enforced upon him included the estimated cost to the city in responding to the fire alarm and extinguishing the fire; the damage to the furniture of the tenants and a fine of 500 marks as a penalty for violation of the law. The damage to the building was not included, because it was held that the owner had been negligent in not knowing the condition of the stove, and therefore should make his own repairs.
